Ahmedabad provides a vastly different climate from Mumbai. Throughout the year it is largely arid searingly hot.

We arrived shortly after the monsoon had passed over and elements of this quenching were still evident. The step wells and water tanks, as we had experienced in Mumbai and Alibag provided a continuity in civic and social attitudes, but the climate of course enables a very different sense of enclosure and shade in the built fabric.

This is evident in both the Indian Institute of Management built by Louis I Kahn (1961) and the Mill Owners Association building built by Le Corbusier (1951) where the formation of spaces, both public and private allows for the movement of air and suppression of the intense heat with a very humane and fluid manner.

Visiting step wells at Adelaj and Sarkhej Roza it is again clear that there is an understanding and depth of knowledge embedded in these 20th Century buildings that transcends the will and capacity of these architects; an understanding that we may see as the result of the patrons and local expertise that was so key to their inception.
